Not long ago Madison Square Garden itself, one of New York's most famous landmarks, was placed on the market at $3,560,000. All kinds of offers for it have appeared. It is doomed to some form of change before many months, that suggested most frequently being the rebuilding of its Madison avenue frontage into a commercially profitable skyscraper, while the Fourth avenue side is left as an auditorium for big entertainments.

Fifth avenue's treasured landmarks are passing rapidly in the 1900 transformation. The past week saw the conveyance of the old Lorlilard mansion at Seventeenth street to a syndicate, which got a $1,230,000 loan for the construction of an office skyscraper on the site. A similar syndicate acquired for a fike operation last month the northeast corner at Thirty-first street, with its old mansions. And further up the avenue the auctioneer's hammer pounded in the old home of the Lotos Club, which was sold at $800,000 this year, as the site for a classical business pile. Nearby a Boston firm acquired the Kaskel and Browning houses at Nos. 550-562 Fifth avenue as the site for a business building on a valuation of $400,000 each, the same properties having been sold at $10,300 each in 1862.
